Rise of Legende

CHAPTER SIX

I wake to the gentle rocking of the boat. Soft candlelight lights my bunk, making eerie shadows across the wood. I pull the scratchy blankets over my head. There must be more time to sleep. It feels like two seconds ago we left the mountain. I hear a sizzle, and than some sparks. Slowly, I lift my head from the pillow and gaze at the candle in the corner. Based on what Pamo told me about the life in the mountains, these candles were how they told time. Every time a candle hits the twelfth line of spark powder, they replace it. That happens at midnight, and noon. They call them the twelfth sparks.
I sit up and change into some waterproof cloths. The CaveDwellers make them out of seal hides. A little bell beside my dresser rings twice, than six times. That is the signal for dinner. I race out the door, and down the dark hallways.

♨

My fingers shake from the cold ocean spray as I tie a tight knot to keep the sails from blowing away. It has been two weeks on the ship, and I have finally gotten used to the swaying of the boat. Pamo had put me to work after dinner on the first day. They figured out that I have good footing, so they had me take care of the sails. After that, I noticed that I could see for miles up there. I finish the knot, and look over the water. For days all I could see was water, but now I see a little haze to the west.
I scramble down the mast, and onto the deck.
“There is an orange haze in the horizon!” I shout to the people milling around. A man I have come to know as Graphite walks up.
“Orange? Thats no rock.....” We both lean over the edge to take a closer look. As the ship floats closer, we can see it more and more clearly. On a deep red island is a city. And the city is being engulfed by flames.
